

AMERICAN MEDICAL PERIODICALS

WITH regard to American periodical literature, it is but justice to say that it is entitled to the highest praise. In point of extent, variety, and practical value, it is unequalled by that of any other nation. Nearly forty presses are employed in its service. Many of the best minds in the country contribute to its pages. If it be true that it is not all equally respectable in matter, taste, and style, enough is left, if we deduct the bad from the good, to satisfy the most fastidious, and to supply, in the most ample manner, the wants of the profession. The matter thus furnished, much of which is never seen by our transatlantic brethren, forms many volumes annually, and contributes, perhaps as much as anything else, to edify and enlighten the profession of the United States. It constitutes, indeed, a most valuable source of information.

Gross, Samuel D.: Report of the causes which impede the progress of American medical literature. Trans. A.M.A. 9: 339-62, 1858.